The Tassili n'Ajjer contains one of the greatest concentrations of rock art in the world and has been designated a UNESCO World Heritage site for both archeological and biological resources. The Tassili is a vast plateau in Southeastern Algeria that borders on Libya, Mali and Niger in the heart of Tuareg country. It is dominated by unique sandstone formations that have been described as "other worldly" or a "lunar landscape." The Tassili is famous for its "roundhead" paintings and for numerous "Tahilahi style" pastoral paintings, as well as some engravings. This talk will focus on the main portion of the plateau where most people visit, as well as the lesser known plateau of Tadjilhine.

Jeff LaFave has been involved with photographing and documenting rock art for over 20 years. He has authored several publications and given numerous presentations on rock art related subjects. Jeff has travelled to visit rock art on all 6 continents which have rock art and has a particular interest in the Sahara. He has also been involved with rock art recording and site monitoring and documentation projects, including helping with projects for the Bureau of Land Management, the U.S. Forest Service, CASSP and various other private groups.
